I live in northern Wisconsin where broadband is still not available in some areas. Access to broadband internet connections should be considered like access to electricity was at one time in rural areas. But it's not only physical access that counts. More importantly, unfettered net access is vital to education and commerce in rural areas.

Extremely important is equal access to the net. This means people in Tomahawk, WI have the same internet speeds as people in New York City without paying more. Title II Net Neutrality is the only fair way to regulate the internet.

Thank you for your attention.
