Executive Summary

Questions have arisen as to the extent to which consumers receive broadcast signals and programming (whether over the air or via cable/satellite delivery) from television stations located in their own state.

This paper examines these issues by estimating the in-state and out-of-state audience reached by local television stations throughout the U.S. We look at delivery of local television stations to consumers via over-the-air transmission and through local cable and national satellite delivery. We also analyze three alternatives for defining local television markets put forth by the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) and the implications of altering the existing system of defining local television markets.

Some of the key results from our analyses include:

- Over-the-air reception by at least one in-state full-power television station reaches 3,067 counties (out of a total of 3,141 counties) and 275.2 million people (97.8% of the total 2000 Census population).
- On a weighted average basis, consumers across all counties nationwide receive over the air 12.2 in-state full-power television stations.
- In the average television market, 96.1% of the local market's population can receive at least one in-state full-power television station over-the-air.
- On a weighted average basis, 12.3 in-state television stations are carried across all cable reporting units.
- Almost all (99.99%) of subscribers to these cable reporting units are estimated to be receiving at least one in-state television station.
- For Dish Network, 97.8% of their subscribers can receive at least one in-state television station. For DIRECTV, 93.9% of their subscribers can receive at least one in-state station.
- Across all counties on a weighted average basis, Dish Network subscribers receive 9.7 in-state television stations and DIRECTV subscribers receive 8.9 in-state television stations.

In light of this data, revisions to local television market definitions to ensure the availability of local service are not only unnecessary, they are also fraught with difficult practical problems. Alternative methods of defining television markets (e.g., use of state boundaries) would not be based on actual viewing patterns, as are the existing television markets, and accordingly would be less reflective of the "real world" television marketplace. The reassignment of counties to different markets could easily result in many viewers receiving service from more geographically distant television stations with lesser connections to those viewers. Redefining markets has the real potential to disrupt local television advertising markets, long-standing program exclusivity arrangements, and the carriage obligations of cable and satellite operators. Finally, if local television markets are redefined, existing local television ownership structures would likely fall out of compliance with the FCC's ownership rules. As shown by the voluminous data in this report, there is no need to take actions likely to produce these various adverse and disruptive marketplace effects.

ANALYSIS OF IN-STATE AND OUT-OF-STATE REACH BY LOCAL TELEIVISON STATIONS

Introduction

American consumers today receive the programming of local television stations in various ways. Where once consumers received broadcast programming only via over-the-air transmissions, they now can receive it from a local cable system or a national satellite delivery system or even via the Internet. The reach of local television stations has thus expanded, with these stations now serving larger geographically dispersed areas.

Questions have arisen as to the extent to which consumers receive broadcast signals and programming (whether over the air or via cable/satellite delivery) from television stations located in their own states.[1] This paper examines these issues by estimating the in-state and out-of-state audience reached by local television stations throughout the U.S. This report looks at delivery of local television stations via over-the-air transmission and through cable and satellite delivery. The report also analyzes alternatives for defining local television markets put forth by the FCC, in response to Congress's request.

We begin this survey of local television service by analyzing the number of consumers who can receive television stations located within their own state through over-the-air transmission. That analysis will provide estimates of the population that receives at least one in-state full-power television station, looking at both individual county and individual television market levels. We also will provide summary statistics on the number of in-state and out-of-state television stations received in each county and television market throughout the country.

We then examine the provision of in-state television stations through carriage by local cable systems. Using data submitted to the Copyright Office, we will quantify (both on a county and television market basis) the numbers of households that receive television stations from their own state delivered by their local cable system. Finally, we conduct a similar analysis on satellite delivery of local television stations. Using data from both national satellite companies as to the local television stations they deliver to specific markets, we can determine the number of satellite-served households receiving television stations from their own state, both on a county and television market basis.

We conclude by evaluating three alternatives for defining local television markets offered by the FCC and the implications of altering the well-established system of Designated Market Areas (DMAs).

An analysis of the data clearly shows the very high levels of in-state broadcast television service currently being provided to the American public. Nearly 98% of the American public can receive at least one in-state full-power television station via over-the-air transmission. Almost all cable subscribers are also being provided at least one in-state television station. Finally, between 94-98% of satellite subscribers are also provided at least one in-state television station. On a weighted average basis, consumers across all counties can receive over the air 12.2 in-state full-power television stations, and 12.3 in-state television stations are carried across all cable system reporting units. Based on this data, it would appear unnecessary to alter how television markets are defined so as to ensure that consumers have access to in-state broadcast television service.[2]

Moreover, there are several significant problems with the proposed alternatives to the present definition of local television markets. First, and foremost, none of these alternatives will reflect the actual present viewing patterns of the American public, and their adoption could ultimately result in decreases in the amount and quality of locally-oriented programming, including news and information, available to television viewers in many markets. Second, these alternative definitions will likely seriously hamper the ability of many local television stations to generate advertising revenues, as these stations will be less able to provide the specific local audiences local businesses want to reach. Third, altering market definitions almost certainly would disrupt important contractual programming relationships, both for network delivered and syndicated programming. Fourth, adoption of these alternatives most likely will lead to significant numbers of station owners being in violation of the existing local television ownership rules, thus needlessly upsetting long-established ownership structures in local television markets.

[2] We note that this report does not address the provision of in-state programming to consumers via the Internet or by stations that license their local programming to multichannel providers for delivery to in-state viewers in non-local DMAs. Thus, the data presented here understate the total level of in-state programming available to viewers.

Delivery of Local Television Stations via Over-the-Air Transmission

Description of Methodology Used in Analysis

With the transition to digital television technology, local television stations transmit a very robust signal with considerably more "information" than the previous analog television signals. Digital technology enables television stations to offer enhanced services to their audiences. Many stations are utilizing the multicast capabilities of digital technology to provide more streams of programming to their viewers.

To quantify the reach of local television stations, we applied the Longley-Rice methodology for estimating stations' coverage patterns.[3] DataWorld, a subsidiary of BIA/Kelsey, maintains a current database of all broadcast technical facilities that allow us to estimate these coverage patterns. We compared these coverage patterns with the 2000 U.S. Bureau of the Census population information on a census block basis.[4] Census blocks are the smallest areas for which population data are provided. There are nearly 5.6 million census blocks in the U.S. These census blocks do not cross county boundaries.

[3] The FCC suggests using the Longley-Rice methodology, as described in OET Bulletin No. 69, Longley-Rice Methodology for Evaluating TV Coverage and Interference, July 2, 1997, Federal Communications Commission. See FCC Public Notice, "Media Bureau Seeks Comment for Report Required by the Satellite Television Extension and Localism Act on In-State Broadcast Programming," MB Docket No. 10-238 (Nov. 23, 2010), p. 2.

[4] Unfortunately, at this time the 2010 Census information is not available on a census block basis. We do not believe that the 2010 Census information would show materially more consumers not being served by local television stations as there continues to be migration towards central urban areas in the U.S., areas that are presently well served by local television stations.

For each census block, we determined whether local television stations' signals reached the centroid (i.e., middle) of that census block. If a station's signal reached that centroid, then we counted that station as serving the population within that census block. Since the identity of each station is known, we knew whether that television station was reaching a census block within the state in which it was licensed, or whether it was an out-of-state television station. We could then calculate the total number of in-state and out-of-state television stations reaching each of the 5.6 million census blocks and the population served by those stations. The census block information on the populations served by varying numbers of in-state and out-of-state television stations can then be aggregated to the county level, thereby generating estimates of the population within each county being served by different numbers of in-state and out-of state television signals.

For example, Autauga County, AL has 981 census blocks within its borders and a total population of 43,671. Table 1 below shows the number of Autauga, AL census blocks that receive varying numbers of in-state full-power television stations and the corresponding population within those census blocks. The weighted average (by the population within these census blocks) of the number of in-state full-power television stations received in this county is 11.1.

County Level Results – Full Power Television Stations

There are 3,141 counties in the U.S., almost all of which are included in the 210 television markets as delineated by Nielsen Media Research.[5] In-state full-power television stations reach at least one census block in an overwhelming majority of these counties -- 3,067 counties have at least some of their population being served by at least one in-state television station. The remote counties that do not receive any service over the air by full-power stations are very sparsely populated. In total, there are only 765,716 people in the 74 counties that do not receive in-state television station service over the air to any part of the county.

Within the 3,067 counties being served by some in-state television stations, the vast majority of the population can receive at least one in-state television station. Overall, 275.2 million people in these counties are able to receive at least one in-state television station over the air, while only 5.462 million in those counties cannot.[6] Combined with the 765,716 people in counties with no in-state television reach, the total number of people unable to receive in-state full-power television signals over the air is approximately 6.227 million, or just 2.2% of the total population in all 3,141 counties. In other words, 97.8% of the total population can receive at least one in-state full-power television station via over-the-air transmission.

In terms of the number of in-state full-power television signals received, the results are equally impressive. Across all 3,141 counties, the weighted average (by the relative population in each county) of in-state television stations received is 12.2 stations.[7] Within these 3,141 counties, consumers also receive a weighted average (by the relative population in each county) of 3.8 out-of-state full-power television stations. Appendix 1 lists all 3,141 counties with the percentage of each county's population receiving over the air at least one in-state full-power

[5] There are 13 very remote counties in Alaska that are not included in any of the 210 television markets.

[6] As shown below, however, many of these viewers will have access to in-state stations and programming by cable, satellite or other means.

[7] Further analysis shows that consumers receive, on a weighted average basis, 9.8 commercial in-state television stations and 2.4 in-state noncommercial stations.

television station, and the weighted averages of the number of in-state and out-of-state full-power television stations received in each county.

We further observe that these data are conservative in demonstrating the actual level of in-state broadcast service available to consumers. Because significant numbers of television stations are multicasting, consumers today receive, across all counties on a weighted average basis, 18.8 program streams from commercial in-state full-power television stations and 6.1 program streams from non-commercial in-state stations. Digital technology has clearly enhanced the amounts of in-state programming channels available to viewers over the air.

In addition, we stress that this data about the over-the-air reach of broadcast stations is limited to full-power stations. We will conduct further analyses relating to the in-state, over-the-air reach of Class A, low-power television and translator stations. This updated data will demonstrate that the over-the-air reach of television stations, taken as whole, is even greater than the already impressive reach of full-power stations alone.

Television Market Results – Full-Power Television Stations

Examining these results on a television market basis requires aggregating the county level data by the markets to which they are assigned.[8] In the average television market, 96.1% of the market population can receive over the air at least one in-state full-power television signal. There are 72 television markets where 100% of the market population can receive at least one in-state television station over the air. Moreover, there are 67 markets where the weighted average number of in-state full-power television stations received over the air exceeds 10 stations (with 152 markets receiving more than five in-state stations and 187 markets receiving more than three in-state stations). Appendix 2 includes a full list of all 210 television markets and the populations within these television markets receiving over the air at least one in-state full-power television station. This appendix also identifies the weighted average number of in-state and out-of-state full-power television stations received over the air in each television market.

Cable Delivery of Local Television Stations

Supplementing the extensive over-the-air service documented above is the provision of local television stations by local cable systems. Beyond providing the local television stations within the cable system's television market, many cable systems carry additional television stations from other markets (including in-state markets). This carriage of "distant" signals thus often provides consumers with another source of in-state television service.

Methodology of Determining Cable Delivery of In-State Television Stations

As part of the requirements for the cable compulsory license,[9] local cable systems have to file semi-annual Statements of Account with the Copyright Office that provide a listing of all television stations they carried. This listing of carried stations includes all the television stations located within the cable system's own television market, as well as the out-of-market (i.e.,

[8] In a small number of markets, counties are split across two markets. Nielsen Media Research does not make publicly available which census blocks in these split counties are assigned to which of the different markets. Accordingly, we assigned each of these split counties to the market in which the majority of the population is located.

[9] See 17 U.S.C. § 111.

distant) television stations being carried.[10] There were 3,721 cable reporting units[11] that reported to the Copyright Office for the first report period (January – July) of calendar year 2009. Every reporting unit provides one principal city (and its corresponding county and state) that we use to assign its home state and home television market. However, the reporting unit can cross over multiple counties and multiple television markets.[12] Cable systems reported a total of 44,905 television stations carried during the first half of 2009.[13]

This total for the first half of 2009 includes many television stations whose analog and digital signals were both being carried at that time. When calculating the number of distinct television stations, we did not count the simulcast signals in our totals. Furthermore, there is no requirement for the cable system reporting unit to report the carriage of any multicast signals of local television stations. While some cable system reporting units did note carriage of these

[10] The local television station listings submitted to the Copyright Office are compiled by CableData Corp., and the listings for 2009 were provided to us. CableData is a Bethesda, MD database firm that has tracked cable carriage of local television stations for over twenty years. Data supplied by CableData Corp. are used by all parties participating in the distant signal copyright proceedings before the Copyright Royalty Board.

[11] Commonly owned cable systems that serve contiguous communities using a single head-end file as a single reporting unit. As a result, there are two small television markets – Zanesville, OH and Glendive, MT – where there were no cable systems reporting units listed. Cable systems in those markets must be included in reporting units of adjacent markets.

[12] It is possible that these cable system reporting units cross state boundaries as well. While this may affect the exact numbers of subscribers receiving in-state television stations, that adjustment should be minor and not change the overall conclusions on the level of in-state television service being provided by local cable systems. As will be shown, many of these cable reporting units are providing out-of-state television stations from adjoining states, expanding the level of in-state television station service to reporting units that cross state boundaries. For example, the cable system in Anderson, KS, carries several Missouri-based television stations. See infra page 12.

[13] The television stations being carried include full-power television stations as well as some Class A television stations and low-power television stations.

multicast signals, we believe that there are a number of carried multicast signals that were not noted. Accordingly, our results understate the total number of program streams from in-state and out-of-state television stations provided to viewers via cable.

For each television station listed for each cable reporting unit we determined whether it was an in-state or out-of-state station by comparing the state of license for the station with the state of the primary city for the cable system. There were 29,087 unique in-state and 9,844 out-of-state television stations carried by cable systems during that time.

Cable System Reporting Unit Level Results

Across all cable reporting units, the weighted average (by the number of subscribers to the reporting unit) of in-state television stations carried was 12.3, with 3.9 out-of-state television stations also being carried.[14] There were only 23 cable system reporting units that carried no in-state television stations, with two of those systems located in protectorates of the U.S. and one at the Guantanamo base in Cuba. After excluding those three systems, only 6,191 cable subscribing households do not have access to any in-state television stations (which represents only .01% of the total number of cable subscribing households included in the CableData database for the first half of 2009). A listing of all 3,721 cable reporting units is included in Appendix 3 with the number of in-state and out-of-state carried television stations noted for each reporting unit.

Television Market Level Results

Clearly, most cable reporting units are providing many in-state television stations, while also providing several out-of-state television stations. As reported above, the national weighted average is over twelve in-state and nearly four out-of-state television stations being provided to viewers by cable systems, on a reporting unit level basis. Appendix 4 includes a listing of all television markets[15] reporting the weighted (by the number of subscribers) average of the number of in-state and out-of state television stations. Across all markets, the weighted (by the television market's total population) averages of the number of in-state and out-of-state television stations provided via local cable systems are 12.3 and 3.4, respectively.

Many of the in-state television stations carried by local cable systems are from adjacent markets. In fact, of the 12,931 "distant" television stations from other markets being carried by local cable system reporting units, more than half (6,983) are in-state television stations.

The cable system in Anderson, KS provides a good example of a system that carries distant (i.e., out-of-market) but in-state television stations. Anderson, KS is a county in the Kansas City, MO-KS television market, located in the southwest corner of this television market. This cable system carries several in-market Kansas City, MO based television stations, thereby providing in-state stations to its Missouri subscribers. The Anderson, KS cable system also carries one Kansas City, KS local market station (KMCI-TV). Beyond those in-market television stations, the cable system in Anderson, KS also carries three out-of-market television stations from Topeka, KS (KSNT-TV, KTWU-TV, and WIBW-TV), thus providing several more in-state television stations to the Kansas based households in this market.

[14] Averaging these cable systems without weighting by the number of subscribers results in an average number of 7.8 in-state and 2.6 out-of-state television stations being carried.

[15] Recall that only 208 television markets have cable system reporting units within their borders.

Satellite Delivery of Local Television Stations

The final providers of local television stations to be examined are satellite delivery systems, specifically the two national companies providing that service – Dish Network and DIRECTV. As part of their "local into local" services, they provide both in-state and out-of-state television stations.

Methodology of Determining Satellite Delivery of In-State Television Stations

To determine the number of in-state and out-of-state television stations provided to viewers by the two satellite delivery companies, we first need to identify the local television stations being provided to satellite households in specific markets. Both Dish Network and DIRECTV have recently submitted to the FCC[16] a listing of the local television stations being provided in each of the markets[17] in which they offer "local into local" television service.

Unfortunately, these companies do not identify the numbers of their subscribers either on a county or television market basis. Estimates can be made, however, of those subscribers both on a television market and county basis utilizing third party sources.[18] We first use Nielsen

[16] November 23, 2010 Letter to Marlene H. Dortch, Federal Communications Commission, from Stacy Fuller, DIRECTV, Inc., RE: Satellite Television Extension and Localism Act of 2010 (STELA) Section 305 Report; November 24, 2010 letter to Ms. Marlene H. Dortch, Federal Communications Commission, from Alison A. Minea, Dish Network L.L.C., Report pursuant to Section 305 of the Satellite Television Extension and Localism Act of 2010.

[17] Dish Network was providing local television stations in all 210 television markets, and DIRECTV was providing local stations in 170 television markets at that time.

[18] Our use of third party sources may either overstate or understate the specific market estimates of the actual number of households receiving in-state television stations from these two companies. We do not believe, however, that our procedure materially affects our estimates of the overall numbers of households receiving satellite delivered services that provide at least one in-state television station.

Media Research's estimates of penetration by television market for Alternative Delivery Systems (ADS)[19] of multichannel video programming. We can apply that market level penetration to the number of households in those markets and then allocate those households between the two providers of satellite service using their relative national subscriber percentages.[20] For the county level estimates we can allocate those market-wide estimates of the number of subscribers for the two companies across the various counties within each market by the relative percentage of the television market's population corresponding to each county.[21]

[19] According to Nielsen Media Research, 30.5% of all television homes subscribe to an Alternative Delivery Service (ADS) provider of Multichannel Video Programming Delivery Services. See http://www.tvb.org/planning_buying/4722/4729. Satellite delivery of multichannel video programming makes up the vast majority of ADS delivery of video programming, as the other options (e.g., SMATV, MMDS, etc.) have few subscribers. According to the most recent FCC report on Multichannel Video Programming Delivery Competition for 2006 there were only 900,000 satellite Master Antenna Service (SMATV) subscribers (a 10% decrease from the year before) and only 100,000 subscribers (the same as the year before) to the wireless cable service provided by Broadband Radio Service (BRS) and Educational Broadband Service (EBS). See In the Matter of Annual Assessment of the Status of Competition in the Market for the Delivery of Video Programming, Thirteenth Annual Report, MB Docket No. 06-189, January 16, 2009, pp. 68-69.

Given the time since that report, we assume that these other ADS providers now serve only 800,000 households, or only 2.4% of all ADS households. We reduce each local television market ADS penetration by that amount to arrive at our estimate of DBS subscribers by market.

[20] In the third quarter of 2010, DIRECTV had 18.2 million subscribers while Dish Network had 14.289 million subscribers. See http://sec.gov/Archives/edgar/data/1465112/000104746910009250/a2200731z10-q.htm and http://sec.gov/Archives/edgar/data/1042642/000104264210000019/ddbs10q2010q3.htm

Note that the subscriber totals are for their general services, not the number of subscribers that receive their "local into local" services, which they do not make public. Therefore, the results in this section are for the number of subscribers that could receive the varying numbers of in-state and out-of-state television stations via these two satellite delivery companies.

[21] While it would be preferable to have the exact numbers of subscribers for each of the services on a county by county basis, we do not believe our estimation procedure materially affects the results.

County Level Results

Across all 3,128 counties[22], the vast majority of satellite subscribers are receiving at least one in-state television station[23] from either one or both of the two satellite delivery companies. For Dish Network, 14.017 million subscribers (97.8% of all their subscribers) located in 2,917 counties can receive at least one in-state television station. For DIRECTV, 17.803 million subscribers (93.9% of all their subscribers) located in 2,648 counties can receive at least one in-state television station.

On average, across the 3,128 counties within local television markets, the average (weighted by the number of subscribers) Dish Network subscriber receives 9.7 in-state and 1.5 out-of-state television stations. For DIRECTV, the weighted average is 8.9 in-state and 1.5 out-of-state television stations. Appendix 5 lists all counties with the number of in-state and out-of-state television stations being provided by both of the satellite services.

Television Market Level Results

As is evident from the county level data, the two satellite delivery companies provide significant levels of in-state television service to their customers. Across all 210 television markets, DIRECTV, on average, provides 5.25 in-state and .88 out-of-state television stations.[24] Dish Network, across all 210 television markets, provides on average 6.62 in-state and 1.12 out-[22] Since there are 13 remote Alaska counties not included in any local television market, and thus we do not have any estimate of the ADS penetration in those counties, we are unable to calculate the satellite delivered households in those counties.

[23] While most of the television stations carried by both satellite companies are full-power television stations, some are Class A and low-power television stations.

[24] This average includes the 40 markets in which they provide no local television station service.

of-state television stations. Appendix 6 lists all 210 television markets, and reports the weighted average (by the number of subscribers) of in-state and out-of-state television stations provided by the two satellite service companies in each market.

Much like the cable delivery of in-state television stations, the satellite delivery of in-state television stations can include stations from other (often geographically close) markets. For example, in the Wichita Falls, TX-Lawton, OK television market, Dish Network provides three Texas stations from this market (KFDX-TV, KJTL-TV, and KAUZ-TV), two Oklahoma stations from this market (KKTTM-TV and KSWO-TV) and one additional Texas station from another market (KTVT-TV, Dallas, TX).

Analysis of Proposed Alternatives to Television Market Definitions

Section 304 of STELA directed the FCC to analyze whether there were alternative market definitions that "would provide more consumers with in-state broadcasting programming."[25] The analyses above clearly demonstrate the already widespread provision of in-state television services delivered over-the-air, and through cable and satellite delivery systems.

Furthermore, in considering the extent of local television service available to viewers, one must also include the services provided by out-of-state (but in-market) stations. It is clear that in-market television stations have strong incentives to serve all the viewers in their markets, even those located out-of-state.[26] In many markets, out-of-state audiences represent a very

[25] FCC Public Notice, p. 5.

[26] Citing the examples of multi-state television markets of Chicago, Washington, DC, and Memphis, Norman Hecht, a 30+ year veteran of local television station sales and research, stated that "Stations are motivated to serve consumers in all counties of their DMA in order to achieve significant portion of the overall market's audience. Thus, television stations have the incentive to – and in fact do – serve their in-market, out-of-state viewers by providing them locally relevant programming, including news and information.[27] Similarly, in the Washington, DC television market, the share of the population residing in Virginia is 45.0%. Obviously, television stations licensed to the District of Columbia have strong incentives to offer locally relevant programming (including locally oriented news, sports, weather, traffic and emergency information) to Virginians residing within the Washington, DC market.[28] One should therefore not assume that only in-state television stations have the incentive or ability to provide locally relevant programming to consumers.

As has been demonstrated, consumers today receive extensive locally oriented service from both in-state and out-of-state (but in-market) stations. Changing the method of defining television markets is therefore not only unnecessary, it also will have widespread negative ramifications in the local television marketplace.[29] It is important to remember that the current definition is based on the actual present viewing patterns of local consumers -- consumers that local retailers and businesses want to reach through advertising.[30] Each year, Nielsen Media Research examines tuning data from their four most recent surveys to determine which counties are assigned to which television markets. The counties are assigned to markets based upon where the preponderance of viewing occurs (i.e., based upon which local television stations the local viewers in those markets tune to). Every year, counties are reassigned to reflect changes in those viewing habits. Therefore, alterations to the present method of defining local television markets will move away from up-to-date assessments of consumers' real-world preferences – and likely toward a method of defining markets that is less grounded in evidence from the actual television marketplace.

FCC Alternative Market Definition #1 – State Level Television Markets

The first alternative television market definition offered by the FCC is to define markets "in terms of the 50 states plus the District of Columbia."[31] As an initial matter, many large states cannot constitute a rational local television market simply because of their geographic size. For example, the distance between the northern border of California and its southern border is approximately 750 miles. The distance between El Paso, TX and Texarkana, TX (nearly 730 miles) is actually further than the distance between Texarkana, TX and Chicago, IL (approximately 670 miles).

[29] The FCC notes that redefining television markets "would likely affect viewers, the advertising market, the number of stations carried by MVPDs in the redefined local markets, and ownership of broadcast television stations." FCC Public Notice, p. 5.

Clearly, these distances far exceed the service areas of broadcast television stations. Thus, television markets based on state boundaries would be arbitrary, as they would not reflect actual station service areas, the viewing patterns and preferences of consumers, or the areas in which local advertisers seek to reach audiences. For example, the service areas of television stations located in San Francisco do not reach to San Diego. Stations licensed to San Francisco offer programming oriented to the San Francisco area, but not programming oriented to the interests of viewers in San Diego (and particularly not local news, weather, traffic and sports programming oriented to viewers in San Diego). Finally, retailers and businesses located in the San Francisco area want to advertise on stations in the San Francisco market to reach potential (i.e., local) customers – not viewers in San Diego highly unlikely to patronize local businesses in San Francisco. For these reasons, it would defy logic (and the economics of the local television marketplace) to define markets based on the 50 states.[32]

Defining television markets based strictly on state boundaries would also be arbitrary because there are a number of cases where certain areas of states are more closely aligned with counties in adjoining states than with counties in their own state. In fact, in defining DMAs,

[31] FCC Public Notice, p. 5.

[32] More locally, consumers in Arlington, VA should not be considered as part of a "Virginia" television market, as Arlington residents are not within the service area of stations in Richmond or Norfolk, would not receive truly local news and information (particularly traffic,

Nielsen Media Research begins with the Office of Management and Budget-defined Metropolitan Statistical Areas (MSAs), which often involve counties in multiple states.[33] For example, ten northern Idaho counties are part of the Spokane, WA television market. Like the twelve Washington counties in that market, these Idaho counties follow Pacific Time Zone hours, unlike all of the remaining Idaho counties. There are many other instances where a part of a state is more closely connected to an area of another state than with other communities within its "home" state.[34]

Defining television markets based on state political boundaries would also have a number of far-reaching and unpredictable effects on the video marketplace as a whole. As the FCC noted, if the definition was changed to state-wide areas, the carriage requirements for local cable and satellite systems would expand very significantly.[35] Table 2 below shows the total number of full-power commercial and non-commercial television stations licensed to each state and the District of Columbia.[36] weather and emergency information) from Norfolk or Richmond, and are not potential customers for Norfolk or Richmond based local business advertisers.

See http://www.census.gov/population/www/metroareas/metroarea.html.

[34] For example, Vancouver, WA – just across the Columbia River from Portland, OR – is more closely tied to Portland than to Seattle (hundreds of miles away) or other cities in Washington state. East St. Louis, IL is more closely aligned with St. Louis, MO than with Chicago or other Illinois communities.

In addition to fundamentally changing the cable and satellite carriage of local television stations, defining television markets on a state-wide basis will also disrupt the long-standing contractual relationships that local television stations have with program suppliers. Network affiliation agreements include terms for market-wide exclusivity, but such terms would be jeopardized by the definition of a television market to include often dozens of stations, including multiple stations affiliated with the same network. Likewise, contracts for syndicated programming also include market exclusivity provisions, and they too, would be disrupted by the adoption of state-wide television markets.

Finally, the FCC's local television station ownership rules would be greatly affected by the establishment of state-wide television markets. Under existing local ownership rules, a single entity can own up to two full-power television stations in the same market so long as there are at least eight independently owned and operating full-power television stations remaining in the market. In most states, there are at least eight independently owned and operated full-power television stations within their boundaries. However, there are 298 instances where one entity owns more than two television stations in a particular state, and thus, would no longer be in compliance with the local television ownership rules. Adoption of a state-wide market definition could accordingly have substantial potential impacts on the existing ownership structure of the local television marketplace.

FCC Alternative Market Definition #2 – Multiple Television Markets Within States

The second alternative suggested by the FCC is to "divide states into multiple markets based on the stations covering different portions of a particular state."[37] This alternative, like the first, would not reflect the actual viewing patterns of the American public. Viewers routinely tune to stations located in adjoining states, as those stations often provide the local news and information most valuable to them. If those stations were no longer "in their markets," they would not necessarily still have access to that programming (especially via cable or satellite carriage).

This alternative also presents difficult issues with assigning counties to particular markets. In certain counties, for example, stations from different markets reach noticeable segments of those counties' viewers. Consumers in Howard County, Maryland receive stations located out of state (e.g., in Washington, DC), as well as stations located in different parts of [37] FCC Public Notice, p. 5.

Maryland.[38] How would Howard County be assigned? At present, it is assigned by Nielsen Media Research based on the viewing patterns of those living in that county. It would be difficult to formulate an alternative method of assignment that would improve upon actual consumer viewing patterns (even if using that criterion does on occasion result in the assignment of some counties to an "out-of-state" market). Adopting a new method for defining television markets thus risks assigning counties to markets on a basis untethered to actual marketplace realities.[39]

Much like the first suggested alternative, this alternative would likely generate complexities related to the exclusive geographic areas for network affiliations, as well as exclusivity arrangements for syndicated programming. Changing existing television markets and combining counties into one new television market within a particular state could easily lead to including within a single market stations that are affiliates of the same network or airing the same previously exclusive programming.

Without knowing specifically how states may be divided into new markets, it is impossible to evaluate the impact of this proposal on cable/satellite carriage obligations, existing program exclusivity arrangements or the ownership structure of local television markets. Existing duopoly situations could be combined in new markets with other full-power television [38] Viewers in Howard County can receive stations from the Baltimore market, but also stations from Hagerstown, MD (which are currently included in the Washington, DC market).

[39] Another issue that would arise under this alternative definition would be the assignment of counties that do not receive any local television stations over the air. As shown earlier, the signal of any local full-power television station does not reach 74 counties in the U.S. How would those counties be assigned to individual markets?

stations owned by the same company, thus creating violations of the FCC's local television ownership rule. Additionally, newly defined markets could contain fewer local television stations, leading to the possibility that a number of existing duopolies would violate the FCC's rules because there would no longer be eight independently owned and operated full-power television stations in the new market.

FCC Alternative Market Definition #3 – Modifying Existing Television Markets to Prevent Cross-State Markets

A third alternative offered by the FCC would be to "modify DMAs so that they do not cross state lines by reassigning counties from one state currently included in the DMA of another state to a neighboring DMA in their home state."[40] This alternative too would create many difficult practical problems. First, the reassigned counties would become part of television markets where the stations are geographically very distant. For example, Dona Ana County, NM is the only county outside of Texas assigned to the El Paso, TX television market. That county abuts El Paso County, TX, with the center of that county being around 50 miles away from El Paso. In contrast, the center of that county is nearly 200 miles away from Albuquerque, NM, the only television market in New Mexico. Clearly, the stations in the El Paso, TX market are better able to provide local news and information (including local traffic, weather and emergency information) to the residents of Dona Ana County, NM than the Albuquerque, NM stations.[41]

[40] FCC Public Notice, p. 5.

[41] Another example is Texas County, OK, which is part of the Amarillo, TX television market. The center of Texas County is 105 miles away from Amarillo, and nearly 250 miles away from Oklahoma City, OK, the closest Oklahoma market.

As described with the other two alternatives above, this reassignment would not reflect the present day viewing patterns of the American public. The people of Dona Ana County, NM do not receive over the air any of the geographically distant Albuquerque, NM television stations and have few, if any, ties to those stations. Local businesses in Dona Ana county also would have little reason for their advertisements to air on stations located in Albuquerque, hundreds of miles away.

Moreover, it would be challenging to formulate rational criteria for reassigning all of the counties currently assigned to “out-of-state” markets. For example, Spotsylvania County, VA, presently assigned to the Washington, DC market, is nearly as close to the Charlottesville, VA television market as to the Richmond, VA television market. Which market would that county be assigned to? Which assignment criteria would be based in the realities of the television market, as is the current system?

Like the other two alternatives, this alternative of adding counties to existing in-state television markets can lead to problems with existing contracts providing for the exclusivity of network programming and syndicated programming. For example, if the eight Virginia counties of the “Tri-Cities”, TN-VA television market were reassigned to the Roanoke, VA television market, WCYB-TV (Bristol, VA), an NBC affiliate, would be in the same market as WSLS-TV (Roanoke, VA), another NBC affiliate. Many similar conflicts would also arise with respect to existing contracts for syndicated programming exclusivity. In addition, if counties are added to existing television markets, such additions would also affect the carriage obligations of cable systems and satellite operators.

Without knowing how all the counties at issue will be reassigned, i.e., what markets will gain or lose counties, it is impossible to accurately quantify the number of situations where the redefinition of local television markets will result in violations of the local ownership rules. Violations will occur if counties are combined so that owners have too many commonly owned stations in a new market. Additional violations will occur if other markets lose counties and stations, so that existing duopolies are no longer in compliance because the revised markets have fewer than eight independently owned and operated full-power television stations.

Conclusion

Congress has directed the FCC to report on the extent to which consumers receive local broadcast signals and programming (whether over the air or via cable/satellite delivery) from television stations located in their own state, and whether alternative methods of defining local markets would provide more consumers with in-state programming. This paper attempts to document this level of service and to discuss the implications of several alternative television market definitions.

What we clearly showed is a very high level of over-the-air in-state television service to the American public. The digital signals now being broadcast by local television stations are quite robust and reach wide audiences. Both local cable and national satellite systems also provide in-state television stations, not only from their home markets but often from adjoining markets. In addition, an examination of specific local television markets shows that out-of-state (but in-market) television stations frequently offer extensive locally-oriented service to viewers

(such as the locally-oriented programming offered by Washington, DC stations to viewers in northern Virginia).[42]

Efforts to alter local television market definitions to ensure the availability of local service are thus not only unnecessary, they are also fraught with difficult practical problems. Alternative methods of defining television markets (e.g., use of state boundaries) would not be based on actual viewing patterns, as are the existing television markets, and thus would be less reflective of the "real world" television marketplace. The reassignment of counties to different markets could easily result in many viewers receiving service from more geographically distant television stations with lesser connections to those viewers. Redefining markets has the real potential to disrupt local television advertising markets, long standing and important program exclusivity arrangements, and the carriage obligations of cable and satellite operators. Finally, if television markets are redefined, existing local station ownership structures could easily fall out of compliance with the FCC's rules. As shown by the voluminous data in this report, there is no need to take actions likely to produce these various adverse and disruptive marketplace effects.

[42] Again, we note that this report does not even address the additional in-state programming available to viewers via the Internet or through stations that license their local programming to multichannel providers for delivery to in-state viewers in non-local DMAs.
