To whom it may concern,

The recent decision by the FCC to repeal net neutrality was undemocratic, unethical, and irresponsible. Despite vast consumer support for a free and open Internet, the FCC continues to ignore its constituents' demands for an Internet not under the heavy-handed control of corporate monopolies. The principle of net neutrality prevents the corporations that own the Internet's infrastructure (who, by the way, have virtually no competition in a market in which it is practically impossible to create a new company) from throttling free speech and double-charging Internet providers for the privilege of having users visit them. Calling the decision to revert the Internet to the control of oligopolies "Restoring Internet Freedom" is hypocritical and deceitful. Restore net neutrality now. If you don't, then what you're going to see is a vastly dissatisfied citizenry denied access to a vital public resource, further undermining what is left of our democracy.

Kelton Holsen, concerned citizen