Dear Federal Communications Commission,

I am a Student at Snow College Ephraim that is attending a 2010 writing class. In this class we were told to pick a topic to argue. I chose to talk about Network Neutrality since it has affected my life personally. I spend much of my recreation time online and the advertisements that have been implicated because of the loss of Net Neutrality make it really hard for one like me to enjoy.

Throughout the past few months from November until January I became heavily involved in the fight to save Net Neutrality. I supported online websites such as, change.org/savethenet and many others. What I do not understand however is despite all of the protests, the plan to revoke Net Neutrality continued. This country, being a Constitutional Republic, should have allowed more of the people's voice to be heard. With Internet Service Providers at the helm of Content/Broadband Providers and more, due to Net Neutrality's absence, they are allowed to choose what types of content filter through. With the rise in monthly subscriptions, most minimum wage breadwinners, such as myself, are not able to afford and use the content desired.

Thank you for allowing me to take a little of your time and I appreciate what you do for the American country. I hope things will work out in the future even if Net Neutrality does not make a comeback. Perhaps there can be a policy in the future that can defend both ISPs and Providers instead of one or the other.

Sincerely,

Candace Dunne
