Re: *Advanced Methods To Target and Eliminate Unlawful Robocalls, CG Docket
No. 17-59

Dear Ms. Dortch:

On June 13, 2018, the undersigned, along with Beth Choroser from Comcast Corporation (“Comcast”), met with Amy Bender from the Office of Commissioner O’Rielly regarding the above-referenced proceeding.

At the meeting, we reiterated Comcast’s strong support for the proposals in the recent Second Further Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in this docket to establish a centralized, comprehensive, Commission-designated database of reassigned telephone numbers, and to encourage use of this resource by adopting an appropriately tailored safe harbor from liability under the Telephone Consumer Protection Act (“TCPA”) for entities that reasonably rely on the database. We emphasized that, as explained in Comcast’s recent comments, the Commission could take various steps to implement this solution in a manner that minimizes costs for the voice providers feeding information into the database and for callers seeking to access the database.¹ We also noted the substantial and lasting benefits that such an approach would bring; in addition to eliminating unwarranted TCPA liability for entities making a good faith effort to comply with the statute, a comprehensive database backed by a safe harbor would dramatically drive down the number of unwanted communications received by consumers and reduce the wasted time and effort that businesses spend on mistakenly calling or texting reassigned numbers.² Given the absence of truly comprehensive tools for tracking number reassignments in the marketplace today, we urged the Commission to move expeditiously towards an order adopting these proposed measures.
