

Internet cost is already at the highest level for a person of limited means. To have services which are currently available for free to be subdivided and charged at a higher rate would be beyond my and many other people means.

To have the ISP providers legally able to bog down streaming competition, or funnel customers service while streaming, to prevent or inhibit them from being able watch content not available from the ISP is not competitive capitalism.

Nor is it healthy for our economy. I remind you of the Robber barons of our past and the state of our country during the Great Depression.

This dismantling of consumer protections is truly a regression and hardship placed upon the very people who worked so hard to enact them.
