

I am in support of net neutrality.

The argument here, although nuanced to some degree with both sides having valid points, comes out clearly in favor of freedom of speech, freedom of information, and freedom to choose.

We no longer live in the time when the internet was a pastime. It is now necessary to everyday life. People rely on and need full and quick access to everything the internet has to offer.

Furthermore, although not part of this particular debate, it may time to remove place the providing of the hardware and infrastructure of the internet in the hands of a government body that has nothing to gain financially from fast lanes and blocking certain services.
