

Internet access has evolved in the last decade. These days it is a necessity for most people regardless of where they live:

- a) job applications must be completed and submitted online,
- b) copyright submissions, important for various creative fields, must be done online,
- c) government document access requests and submissions are expedited when performed online,
- d) emergency information during natural disasters can be retrieved online.

This is in addition to online commerce, and recreational activities.

The public needs access to resources that will not be arbitrarily curtailed by business alliances that favor business partners over competitors. If ISPs do not have to provide equal access, only those able to pay will be able to remain viable. Do not modify the existing net neutrality rules.
