

America invented the Internet. The Internet is something we Americans should exhibit Pride and Patriotism with the assuredness of an undisputed mastery of a technology we invented and not just among ourselves but to the entire planet. We should be setting the bar in terms of speed and quality and proudly working hard to do so as opposed to lowering standards and blatantly exposing to ourselves and the world over that American Exceptionalism is little more than false advertising fabricated by propaganda experts of American Capitalism. The Internet isn't just about the future, a future too many Americans obviously want to surrender to others so that they can take charge of it, but it is very much about today as well. Jobs throughout America and countless homework assignments along with numerous other tasks right now require Internet access and a slower, less reliable Internet makes America as a whole slower and less reliable. Right-wing ideology pushes the fallacy that everyone somehow benefits if some are more privileged than others which is really just an excuse for inequality. But this desire to lower Internet standards is a transparent example of the true intentions of that mentality which is some people usually can't have more or ideally much more than others unless those others have less regardless of the consequences. Quality in this fantasy is something that should be exclusive to those that can afford it even if that means degrading what the majority have to ensure a relative contrast. However, the majority in this case aren't foreigners living around the world, which would be bad enough, no, these are fellow Americans having their functional lives downgraded in the digital world in which we now live. Despite the widespread dishonesty, the Free Market isn't about competition, it's about prohibiting a level playing field. What is truly being exhibited in this effort by the Trump controlled FCC is what American Exceptionalism is actually about – Restricted Distribution. In the ideal Right-wing environment, better service will certainly exist but it'll of course be too expensive for most Americans and America as a nation will suffer while simultaneously allowing other parts of the planet to collectively race past us with better Internet service for more of their populations along with the aggregated knowledge and upcoming innovations that will inevitably result from that. In essence, this effort to diminish America's already feeble Internet standards is outsourcing America's future for short-term profits and isolated preponderance while proving once more that Patriotism in general is nothing more than a talking point for proponents of moralless Free Market Greed. However, by confusing disdainful Selfishness for actual Patriotism, Chairman Pai's determination to depreciate America's Internet and as a consequence downsize America's global standing must be as Patriotic as a self-centered mindset of superiority through needless inequality along with the irreparable subsequent harm to his fellow compatriots can get. Clearly to Chairman Pai, multi-tiered complacency is what passes for innovation in America now.
