

I believe that expanding access of high-speed broadband to rural areas of the country can only serve to benefit the nation. In addition to the increased optimization of more advanced farming technologies, improved accessibility to the Internet can help the spread of information to more isolated communities. These enhanced streams of communication can only lead to more efficient agricultural production and a generally more informed public. Not granting equal access to the world's single largest source of information puts large portions of the country at a significant disadvantage in every walk of life.
