

Where I live there is only one internet service provider. TWC/Spectrum. If the Net Neutrality rules are done away with TWC can and will now charge me to access streaming services I already pay for in order to drive me to buy there cable services. Removing Net Neutrality will be the end of the cable cutters. I am sure TWC already throttles my data on various websites since at 60 mb/s I have issue watching SD video from certain sites. I run a speed test and my speed starts off minimal and then rises to the speeds I pay for after a few seconds when there systems realize I am running a speed test. Without NET neutrality streaming services such as NETFLIX, HULU, AMAZON, GOOGLE PLAY, VUDU, etc. will all die a slow painful death as power is handed to the ISP. Most people I know only have one ISP to choose from so requiring them to abide by what they promise doesn't mean much. Since in an area the consumer may only have one choice for high-speed/ultrahigh-speed internet, in my case TWC/spectrum, all they must do is promise to charge more for all streaming service access. They are then in compliance with the new rules but my internet bill goes up to cost more than cable if I want to keep my streaming services. I will then be forced to buy a cable subscription from the same company that forced me out of streaming. Great idea guys. Get you head out of your asses and come live in the real world.

Thank you,

James Cassell
