I strongly support Net Neutrality. The internet is a utility and should be classified as one. I can't imagine how one can think that this is good for anyone but the small amount of very big companies. You can't treat the internet like a cable TV channel subscription model, it does not work. Limiting what people can find and see on the internet in a dystopian nightmare coming to reality.

Having to buy the internet in pieces where you have to pay to see certain sites or use certain functions is insanity. Imagine you have to pay for internet access, then you have to pay for Netflix to use their service. But now the internet access you have doesn't have the streaming package, now you have to add that to your internet plan. Say you want to play video games online, not only do you have to buy the service from Microsoft and Sony, now you have to increase your internet package. This is all crazy and needs to be fair. What if I didn't like my AT&T service, what if AT&T blocks access to T-Mobile's website so I can't do research and switch? This will quickly fuck consumers.

Companies have shown us that they are very greedy and will see how far they can go and how much they can get away with. There's no reasonable reason with abolishing net neutrality is a bad thing. This is just an old way of thinking trying to stop progress in it's tracks because their business model is dying and they don't know how to evolve and move forward.
