

In the post-truth, faux-news era, the internet represents more than a utility. It is the last public bastion in what has rapidly become an information war of nuclear proportions. If net neutrality is eliminated, the global public's ability to express itself will be at the mercy and whims of a few short-sighted capitalists. This is the climate change of cyberspace. The choices we make this year will have rippling impacts for untold generations.

Do the humane thing. Preserve net neutrality as if it were the oxygen we breathe. Because ironically the oxygen we breathe may not be around for much longer without allowing the free proliferation of science and information which the internet facilitates.
