

The new motion to open the regulation of internet neutrality to being regulated by corporations will yield less equality in marketing and search results top hits for those internet sites that might not have the capability to compete with other corporate entities. The internet should be a place in which all forms of internet use should be treated equally. If the FCC is to move with its desire to deregulate themselves from the medium then it can potentially lead to other problems. Problems such as hiking internet rates for certain forms of usage which can target certain users. The internet should be a free and open space for human ingenuity, ideas, opinions, and information to exist without discrimination. My concern is how long will some websites see traffic until the internet providers decide that they no longer wish to host that website. While at first it may take out "useless" sites how long will it take before the companies decide to no longer serve informational sites and place blinders on the minds of people. And what if those sites that remain serve information that is false or caters to a particular interest. Deregulation on the part of the FCC will create a money game between people who hold large amounts of capital. Small and service industry business will not be able to survive, which in smaller communities are sometimes essential cornerstones to the local economy.

The FCC is a part of the government which represents the populous of these United States of America. It is your job, in my opinion, to have our interests as top priority. Companies do not represent us, they buy and own us so to keep us purchasing their product (and if deregulated only show us their product without us knowing of a better alternative). It is the government's job to serve and protect the interests of its people, not the interests of corporate entities which comprises of more than one persons.
