

TO: Federal Communications Commission
FROM: Audrey Lewis
DATE: November 22, 2017
SUBJECT: Complaint Against the FCC Rule Change Regarding Net Neutrality

Please understand that the rule changes regarding net neutrality do nothing to increase the consumers' ability to afford and access the internet. As more public and private services move to online portals these rules would effectively inhibit consumers' ability to participate in market sources and limit their ability to a number of constitutional rights in today's economy.

These changes reflect a lack of commitment to your appropriate constituency – the American people not telecom and ISP corporations. The FCC would be cutting off the path to innovation and the future hope of economic progress with these rules. The internet is a venue defined by collaboration, creativity, and engagement. Allowing private institutions to regulate the access to such a venue essentially equates to the declaration that short term monetary gains for these few companies are more important and valuable to the FCC than the future of the entire country.

To reiterate, these changes do not benefit consumers. They do not create competition; they create barriers to access. They inhibit the American citizenry to participate in the modern reality and global community. Enacting these changes would be unpatriotic, illogical, and ethically corrupt.

Please consider the weight of your actions on all Americans, not just on your own ability to access or the impacts of your decisions on potential investment opportunities. Do what is right for the American people, not for those looking to extort money from the American populace.

Sincerely,
Audrey Lewis