

I urge the FCC to listen to the voices of the people they are meant to represent over the very select few corporate interests. Repealing Net Neutrality is an attack on the American public's free speech in order to pad a few corporate CEOs' wallets. The free web and access to information is part of what makes America great: driving connection, growth, ingenuity, and innovation. Removing this freedom will be a major step back in our great country's progress.

Net Neutrality is a bipartisan issue that affects all citizens equally. The FCC will be ignoring millions of taxpaying American citizens they are meant to represent. The FCC has already failed in promoting competition between ISPs and allowed these companies to become monopolies, so I implore you at the very least to protect our right as citizens to access a free and open web. Allowing these monopolies to throttle what people see online will completely prevent small businesses from being able to compete with giant companies: the groundbreaking startup can't afford to bribe the ISPs for visibility like big corporations can. No, it will not stimulate the economy and job growth, it will do the opposite.

This is important. This is personal. The inevitable backlash against you if you repeal Net Neutrality, as even more people and companies begin to understand its significance, will not only hurt your career, but cause your names to forever be remembered as those that destroyed the free web and stifled free speech.
