

Net neutrality is critically important to the world and especially to the United States of America. It provides the infrastructure backbone for access to key information that includes, but is not limited to, sharing of medical information for research purposes, innovation, creativity, and economic growth. If net neutrality ends it will severely cripple the United States while the rest of the countries around the world continue to grow and prosper.

Thanks,

Ben Hutchinson