

Nov. 22, 2017

Comment to the FCC regarding "Net Neutrality" rules:

I use the internet for information: directions and maps, recipes, news and other interesting articles, product manuals, how-to information, and weather and safety updates. (I rarely watch television.)

I also use it for communication via email and "social media." Twenty years ago the telephone was my primary means of communication with friends and family. Today it is the internet.

I use it for shopping, as well, purchasing items difficult to find locally.

I use it to pay all of my bills.

I use it to communicate with my health provider.

I use it to file my tax returns.

Much of the information and many of the products I find do not come from highly-funded sources. Allowing ISP's to make access slower, or making it cost me more to access particular websites, essentially cuts me off from information I need, and from making purchases.

The internet a toy for entertainment. If you believe it is, I suggest you stop using it entirely, and discover how that affects you.

Please, do not take everything that is good and destroy it by "monetizing" it. Thank you.

Charles Berger

Longmont, Colorado