

I firmly oppose the proposed changes to net neutrality rules. A neutral internet that guarantees the same speeds for all providers and consumers has been key to spurring innovation and growing the economy. Giving large companies advantages over small ones would not only inhibit the success of new companies that could become economic drivers, but could also hurt consumers forcing them to pay higher rates for the services they want. The neutral internet has been a huge economic driver for our country and should remain neutral.