

Hello,

Net Neutrality is important. Repealing it does not create the free market that Ajit Pai is claiming. Allowing telecom companies control of content is censorship and restrictive to a democratic platform which knowledge and communication thrive. Does that sound very American to you?

Stripping Net Neutrality apart won't give small business the same opportunity to succeed as large corporations such as Walmart. Internet Service Providers will be able to charge not only consumers but those producing content. The mom-and-pop pizza place down the street won't have a chance if ISP's decide to charge for faster load speeds. We need small business.

This is all okay as long as they disclose exactly what they're doing though, right? That sounds like giving a criminal a gun and saying, "Well if you shoot anyone we'll have to throw you in jail." What if the government didn't regulate electric companies? Is there a difference? A majority of Americans don't see the difference.

If the majority of Americans support Net Neutrality, doesn't it seem tyrannical to go against what the people want? Please, prove to us America is not becoming the oligarchy many of us fear it is.

Sincerely,

Ashley M. Veal
