

Net Neutrality is essential aspect of communication in the digital age. To abrogate this principle is to transform the internet from an open platform for the exchange of ideas, information, and commerce to a commodity owned by the moneyed elite to parcel out to high bidders.

The open Internet has provided all classes of people with unprecedented access to content that previously did not exist or was siloed in discrete locations. This is true for educational resources as well as virtually all concrete facets of the economy. To eliminate Net Neutrality would be to turn the clock back, to essentially resurrect and build new restrictions on access to information.
