

To the members of the Federal Communications Commission:

My name is Isaac. I am 19 years old, and I live in Oregon.

I have heard that your commission chairman, Ajit Pai, has announced that the FCC will be voting to put an end to its current protections for net neutrality on December 14th.

This concerns me very much, because I believe in the principle that Internet service providers should treat all traffic equally; and that, by tossing out our current regulations, we may very well have a future where ISPs favour or block websites and applications according to their own interests. Mr. Pai, this isn't just an issue of telecommunications, this is about equal treatment and access to information. If you and other members of the FCC follow through on favouring corporate interests over the American people at large, you will be giving undue power to ISPs; due to conflicts of interests, I believe that this will ultimately stifle innovation, education, economic competition, and—most importantly—intellectual liberty.

Therefore, I urge the FCC to vote to maintain its current protections for net neutrality, and to ensure that Internet service providers be required to treat all traffic equally.

Thank you very much for your consideration.
