I'm a registered independent in Ohio. As a small business owner and as a consumer, I'm asking the FCC to reverse course and protect consumer's access to a free and open internet. ISPs shouldn't get to determine which content my customers are able to see. And as a customer, I shouldn't have to worry that big businesses might censor, restrict, or place higher costs on content I access on the web. This ridiculous corporate giveaway is shortsighted, and it'll kill innovation in this country.

You're going to anger a lot of swing voters like me if you go through with this knuckle-headed policy. I mean—truly. How much more soaring profits does a company need to make? And is it truly worth crippling our citizenry's access to fair and open information and communication to do that? If your answer to that last question is "yes," consider that the public will remember your votes, and the electoral retribution will be swift.
