

I support Title 2 and urge congress not to expand market freedoms at the expense of true individual freedom. If ISPs are granted permission to preference certain sites over others, it challenges the true concept of American freedom: that anyone can do what they dream, as long as they work hard and don't hurt other people. The internet has offered us an access channel to actualize this American Dream in historically unprecedented ways; however, if not properly overseen by regulatory authorities, the internet also risks becoming a useless space where true innovators must achieve some degree of financial success as a precursor to access the means to pursue their prime objectives. If America is indeed the land of the free and the home of the brave, how can we be too cowardly to protect the freedom for all Americans to access this important business space? Threatening true freedom of access to the internet by allowing the companies who sell access to gouge customers (both businesses and individuals/families within population) sounds like an un-American plan to me.
