Please do not revoke the regulations related to network neutrality. "Treat all network traffic equally" is not "micromanaging the internet" — it is the easiest to follow, default setting of network management. Instead, it is the ISPs who want to "micromanage the internet" by introducing all new levels, price packages, "select service" fast lanes, and other concepts that will cripple and hamper an open internet free from corporate influence. Already the major ISPs have walked back on their promise to not introduce prioritized traffic were network neutrality revoked. Being "transparent" about their practices will do nothing for those whose markets are provided by only choice of ISP provider.

Network neutrality is the default position. Please do the right thing by ensuring its continued existence.

Cody Cobb
Bryan, TX