

Bethany Molitor
5509 4th St. NE
Washington, DC 20011

RE: FCC 17-108

December 14, 2017

To Whom It Should Concern:

I am writing as a citizen to support Net Neutrality backed by title 2 oversights of ISPs.

I do not understand why these changes are even being considered when it limits an innovation that has leveled the playing field in the arts, reference materials, and yes, politics. The internet offers the community access to ALL available perspectives, not just those that we pay extra to see. You will effectively cordon off people with limited means – inequity at its best.

Truly, I am ashamed that an agency meant to work for us – we pay you – is looking for ways for us to pay corporations more. Let me be clear, I currently pay roughly $90/month for high speed internet in my home, a luxury is the speed. Your plans will increase that amount and limit the things I can access. For those who already cannot afford high speed internet, you would block their access to websites and materials, when they already have slow access based on their means.

And then there is the question of what content will be available to us when corporations can control what we see. Dystopian movies about the future don't seem so far fetched when plans like this are put forth.

If the FCC doesn't work for its citizens, then what is the point of your agency? Check yourself before you wreck yourself.

Sincerely,

Bethany Molitor
Washington, DC