Comment from Seneca J. Velling

Federal Communications Commission
Office of the Secretary

It has been generally known for some time now that there was a scheme to corrupt the public comment process for the proposed repeal of net neutrality rules. An enormous number of fake comments were sent to the FCC about its move to repeal net neutrality rules. Those behind the scheme may have impersonated hundreds of thousands of real Americans by appropriating their names and addresses to make submissions, he said, in a scam akin to identity theft on a massive scale. As a former victim of credit card theft and data breaches effecting me personally and financially, I request the FCC address these concerns and release documentation to the public on the comments, their IP/MAC addresses, their nations of origin, and the stance of the comments in favour or in opposition to Net Neutrality repeal.
