

Addition of these requirements, combined with vigorous Commission enforcement, will do much to alleviate instances of number warehousing and hoarding which have been observed in the provision of 800 service. On the other hand, in its zeal to correct perceived (and anticipated) problems, the Commission must be mindful to avoid "over-regulation" through the adoption of proposals like number replication and escrowed deposits. Such measures are of doubtful utility, and indeed may undermine the very goals they were meant to advance by stifling the development of toll free service and the growth of competition among RespOrg providers.
