Bob Robinson (_bob@msn.com) writes:

I am adamantly opposed to ISP's being required to pay access fees to local carriers. The local carriers are already being compensated by local access fees. Additionally your remarks about providing access to students is timely. I know you realize that most, if not most, student research and use of the internet occurs at home. There are many instances where public facilities, like libraries, do not have adequate after hour resources to support the student demand for internet services.

I would hope the FCC would also invest significant energies and monies to assure the internet is SAFE for children. I personally prefer the RSAC model implemented by Microsoft. I would like to see this type of content based rating system MANDATORY. I would also like there to be substantive penalties for failure to provide accurate ratings. I would like to see international sites not complying to be electronically blocked for access purposes.

Sincerely Yours,

Bob Robinson
