As an ISP user i feel that the government should allow these ISP's to continue using the lines it currently does at the SAME RATES. It seems clear that the major telephone line owners want to squeeze out small (but profitable) ISP's who often put their cash on the line to start a small business. Dont let them do this.

I am against any redefinition by the FCC to clarify its definitions of "information service," "local exchange carrier," and "telecommunications service" which leads to increase in fees to Internet Service Providers.

I rely on the use of unlimited access to the internet for important business related work. This work is in higher education. I am paid very little and rely heavily on the use of the internet to communicate with colleagues all over the world. Any changes which will increase the costs to Internet Service Providers will negatively impact so many people who can not afford to have their service costs increase.

I already provide the phone company more business by purchasing an additional line to carry my vital internet work. I do not feel it is necessary to redefine FCC regulations so the phone companies can get more money.

Thank You for letting me comment.

While not a great fan of the Internet, I am concerned that any additional fees allowed or imposed on telephone service for this access would make the Internet unaffordable to many who use its services. This would appear to me to be counter productive.
