I would like to voice my support to the FCC for Public Knowledge's recommendations. It's become increasingly clear as AT&T unveils their plan for the IP transition that they intend to use network upgrades as a guise to work around their obligations as common carriers, and providers of regulated phone service to consumers and competitive service providers alike.

Strong and well thought out regulations have done an applaudable job of helping keep the phone network accessible and of unsurpassed quality for generations. I would like to recommend to the Commission that they continue to uphold them so this standard of service isn't lost to time.
