I am strongly opposed to any kind of tiered service system for internet providers. Most internet users would wind up losers if only companies with deep pockets can buy their way into fast-track services. If the chief regulator of Internet services is a former lobbyist for Comcast, and if the president of Comcast plays golf with The U.S. President, it seems very clear to me that an unbiased process is in significant danger. It seems like the foxes are watching the hen house, to put in other words. As in politics, deep pockets always trump what is right and fair. Please do not damage "Net Neutrality" by giving the service providers what they want. For once, please decide in the public's interest.
