I am writing in support of net neutrality. Cable companies are among the most despised of businesses we have to deal with every day. How could you even dream of giving them control over every citizen's contact with the outside world? I'm sorry, but they have absolutely no high ground in this debate. I wish I could have nothing to do with Time Warner, but they're the only game in town (except AT&T which is just as bad. And as soon as I had a chance, I switched from Verizon to T-mobile for cell phone service because T-mobile responded to the market.) The game they're all playing is getting some kind of monopoly so that we have no choice but to accept their high prices and lousy service. Other countries have it much better. Your job is to give us choices. I agree that competition is important to good quality, low cost service. But much of what the US calls a free market is really monopolistic, and your job is to protect us. Thanks!
