

60000983570.txt

ISPs should not be able to wantonly and capriciously regulate the flow of information on the internet. More and more, internet access is becoming a vital utility, as important to staying productive and functional as municipal water and electricity. It must remain open and unregulated, free from corporate interests, not only to preserve the vital information flows it supports, but also to force market innovation and new technologies capable of supporting increasingly greater bandwidths.