

Dear Chairman Wheeler:

I am writing to urge the Commission to adopt strong E911 rules to protect the public and ensure first responders can successfully reach people in need. The Federal Communications Commission estimates more than 10,000 lives could be saved each year if emergency responders were able to quickly locate and reach 911 callers who use cell phones, particularly those who are indoors.

Today, millions of Americans depend on their mobile phones to place emergency calls to 911. However, the FCC does not have location accuracy requirements for callers dialing from inside buildings. This is especially alarming for the deaf and hard of hearing community, children who may not know where they are located, victims of domestic abuse, and the elderly.

More than one-third of households in the United States are wireless-only homes, including nearly 45% of children and more than 50% of adults living in poverty. Mobile phone adoption is high among Hispanic adults, with more than half living in wireless-only homes, and among African American households.

Our nation's public safety system must ensure that all people have equal access to emergency services, regardless of race, age, sex, income, location or access to technology. New technologies should be a step forward for everyone and should not leave anyone behind.

I urge the Commission to adopt its proposed location accuracy framework to ensure all people have equal access to reliable public safety services.

Sincerely,

It seems it's always the low income people that suffer. They may have free cell phones from the government, but they're no good if they cannot be

Let's not forget, that cellphone companies charge user for the 911.

1st responders need all the tools they can get.

Updated tech is one of them.

When lives are at stake, especially with the deaf and hard of hearing, it is imperative to provide support. If two people, one hearing, and one deaf, both in different buildings and get in a life-threatening accident, why is it the hearing person is able to call 911 on their cell and get help, and the deaf is not able to text 911 and get help? What if both are incapable of maintaining the call or text conversation? They should be able to call 911, and have faith 911 will locate them accurately even if they lose consciousness.

When you reach out for emergency help, you want to be confident help is coming. Nobody should ever have to feel forsaken and helpless. The movement to implement 911 via text, wireless 911, and indoor location is absolutely imperative. Simply waiting for the carriers to come up with their own solutions is foolish, as waiting will cost lives. Mandate that they make use of available tech -- it's exactly that -- available and ready for use. If they come up with their own solution down the road, they're welcome to swap out the third party solution providing wireless 911 and indoor location will experience no downtime during the swap.

dying the longer people take to think about it, and whether they should wait for the carriers. Enough lives have already been lost, and any further delay is unconscionable.

Wireless service is still totally unreliable and has never come up to the standards set by the wireline companies, and it has never been more apparent than in the methods used by cell companies to locate customers calling E911 during emergencies. Having spent 42 years in the wireline communications industry working with PSAPs and now a member of a Quick Response team, I find it shameful that the

Chief 11-70

On February 14, 2011 I was hit from behind by a 3 ton truck in front of my house. The driver, left the scene & switched w/ his passenger they came back but we are all facing the opposite direction. I was unconscious, my airbags did not deploy, took 3 hits to the brain and 911 had to be call twice because they drove past the address they were given on the cell phone. I suffered a traumatic brain injury that has left me unable to work and the case is still in litigation. I was sent home from the hospital with whiplash because I was awake by the time 911 arrived and the man who claimed to be the "driver" told the police that I stopped short, did not use my signal and he destroyed the scene.

Dear Chairman Wheeler:I am writing to urge the Commission to adopt strong E911 rules to protect the public and ensure first responders can successfully reach people in need.â€The Federal Communications

Samantha Henry	SC

Commission estimates more than 10,000 lives could be saved each year if emergency responders were able to quickly locate and reach 911 callers who use cell phones, particularly those who are indoors. Today, millions of Americans depend on their mobile phones to place emergency calls to 911. However, the FCC does not have location accuracy requirements for callers dialing from inside buildings. This is especially alarming for the deaf and hard of hearing community, children who may not know where they are located, victims of domestic abuse, and the elderly. More than one-third of households in the United States are wireless-only homes, including nearly 45% of children and more than 50% of adults living in poverty. Mobile phone adoption is high among Hispanic adults, with more than half living in wireless-only homes, and among African American households. Our nation's public safety system must ensure that all people have equal access to emergency services, regardless of race, age, sex, income, location or access to technology. New technologies should be a step forward for everyone and should not leave anyone behind. I urge the Commission to adopt its proposed location accuracy framework to ensure all people have equal access to reliable public safety services. Sincerely, Samantha Henry

Dear Chairman Wheeler:

I am writing to urge the Commission to adopt strong E911 rules to protect the public and ensure first responders can successfully reach people in need. The Federal Communications Commission estimates more than 10,000 lives could be saved each year if emergency responders were able to quickly locate and reach 911 callers who use cell phones, particularly those who are indoors.

Today, millions of Americans depend on their mobile phones to place emergency calls to 911. However, the FCC does not have location accuracy requirements for callers dialing from inside buildings. This is especially alarming for the deaf and hard of hearing community, children who may not know where they are located, victims of domestic abuse, and the elderly.

Regina Nelson	TX

More than one-third of households in the United States are wireless-only homes, including nearly 45% of children and more than 50% of adults living in poverty. Mobile phone adoption is high among Hispanic adults, with more than half living in wireless-only homes, and among African American households.

Our nation's public safety system must ensure that all people have equal access to emergency services, regardless of race, age, sex, income, location or access to technology. New technologies should be a step forward for everyone and should not leave anyone behind.

I urge the Commission to adopt its proposed location accuracy framework to ensure all people have equal access to reliable public safety services.

Sincerely,

Regina L. Nelson

I am an ex-cop. This is vital, because no one can come to help if they don't know where to go. The first piece of information given by a caller should be the location followed by the emergency. This is true for police, fire, ambulance.

We have a volunteer fire department and just yesterday, the Assistant Fire Chief was on his way to a fire call. He stopped at my home looking for the particular address from which the call was made. I was not familiar with the address that he mentioned so he asked if he could use my land line as the cell phone could not be used! In my area, cell phone coverage is extremely spotty with many "dead areas". This is why the Commission needs to adopt strong E911 rules to protect the public and ensure first responders can successfully reach people in need.

With the increasing usage of wireless devices for communication, it is vital and lifesaving that the FCC strengthen the rules enabling 911 coverage access for all! This is urgent/emergent and must be handled immediately and efficiently!

It's a safety issue.

As a 911 dispatcher I couldn't agree with this anymore. Our center is only in phase 2 of wireless 911 calls, granted it pings in a radius of 3 miles, but still we need it to ping at a residence. Guaranteed this could save many lives.
