What large cable corporations are attempting to do is egregious. It is not uncommon for lobbyists to curry favor and buy their way to favorable legislation, but the concept of Net Neutrality needs to be preserved with rigor. There is no more room for abuse of Internet privileges in a society whose functional existence becomes ever more Internet-based. The United States currently spends more money on average than any other country on Internet expenses per capita, and we cannot afford to relinquish Internet speed to fuel monopolies and incite abuses of power at the expense of the consumer. If anyone at the FCC has the slightest sense of foresight, the agency will rule in favor of protecting Net Neutrality, and will stifle the proposed change.
