Just a few quick comments:

It's clear that the petitioners are doing this to preserve their ability to extract additional fees from their customers, by removing ways of getting online that the customers already have through the cell phone network and personal wifi hotspots. I'm kind of surprised they are not asking for the right to block cell phones, and insist that we all use their in-room phone service instead.

If the petitioners want to make money providing online services, they should innovate a service that is better than what their customers bring, and which people might be willing to pay for. In actual fact, wifi at these hotels typically is worse than what we get through our cell phone network!

The argument that they're doing this to enhance security is bogus. If there is truly an abuse of these unlicensed bands, the FCC is there for enforcement.

Please do the right thing and rule against the petitioners!
