Allowing anyone to robocall results in everyone robocalling.

Since you've already allowed charity organizations to make robocalls, charities are being used to try and sell siding, replacement windows, 3rd party services all in the name of raising funds for these charities.

Since you allow political organizations to make robocalls, my household is woken up at all hours of the day, 7 days a week during campaign seasons, with callers declaring their candidate to be the one to vote for. I make a record of who robocalls my house, and add their candidate to my list of who NOT to vote for.

Allowing debt collectors would be worse than both of these nuisances combined. We'd be inundated with calls 24x7 for people whose phone numbers haven't been valid for said person in years. Certain debt collection agencies threaten people to pay the bills for other people just because we received that other person's old phone number. They call so many times that either they get a new number, which is a major hassle, or they end up paying someone else's debt just to stop them from calling.

The ONLY change that you should be making is that ALL robocalls not affiliated with local schools, utilities or emergency services are blocked. The robocalls allowed for schools should be pertinent to the schools our children attend, things like weather warnings, early outs, etc. The robocalls allowed for utilities would include delayed services like trash pickup, warnings about water quality issues, etc.

The change would include disallowing charities and political organizations from calling via robocalls or human calls.

The fines need to be higher per call. If they block their callerid, they need to be 10x a regular fine. If they spoof their callerid to someone else's number, then a 20x fine.

The fines need to be paid directly to the person that they called, not the government. The fines paid to the person called should be tax-free.
