I have no vested interest in this issue -- except as a citizen who may someday be (or have a loved one) in a life-or-death situation for which a mobile 9-1-1 call would make all the difference in the world. From what I have read, the comments from many, and as a technologist, I can only conclude that the requirements that the FCC originally proposed, and the associated timeline, is necessary to create the pressure to rapidly deploy a crucial public safety capability.
