

60001018448.txt

The Internet as it is is not broken. Please don't create a tiered system of speeds that will allow ISPs to charge consumers more money for Internet service that is more expensive in the US than in the majority of other developed nations. I, for one, plan to switch my service away from Comcast and Verizon should the FCC end net neutrality by reclassifying the Internet under Title X. Fortunately, for me, I have that luxury unlike many folks in the US that only have access to one ISP. ISP monopolies abound in the US, which is probably why Comcast was recently voted the WORST company in America by consumers.