

60001025741.txt

The internet should be free and open. Telecommunication companies and Internet Service Providers should not be able to discriminate based on content of websites or their use. The majority of the country is dominated by a few large companies with monopolies on providing internet for their region. As a result these companies can charge inflated prices for poor services. The US lags behind former Soviet Bloc countries in average internet speed. This is in large part due to large companies with the ability to throttle internet speed and no incentive to improve service, because the consumer has no options. You would be hard pressed to find any consumer who has a positive view of Comcast, Time Warner, or any other company with a monopoly. The happiest consumers are those in places like Chattanooga, TN where their local municipal government had enough of the poor service being provided to them and took matters into their own hands by providing public high speed internet. This was opposed through various lawsuits by the local monopoly.