

60001027510.txt

I am strongly opposed to allowing Internet Providers to further monopolize themselves by imposing speed limits for companies who can then demand shape their markets even further.

Case in point would be the Netflix/Comcast contract negotiation where a precipitous dip in Netflix's ability to broadcast its content was observed until terms were reached.

As a PAYING consumer I demand access to any content at the speeds that I paid the provider for. I should not have to worry that certain websites will take twice as long to load because they are not willing or able to pay a large provider the fee they demand.

This will also allow companies like Verizon or Comcast to stifle competition by restricting bandwidth or charging excessive fees to competitors. I can find NO REASON in the interest of the end users for this to be allowed to happen.

"No" to allowing the FCC to reverse their position on Net Neutrality!