Dear Congress,

I believe that the United States must uphold Net Neutrality, in order to maintain a free, open, and equal opportunity Internet for all.

The beauty of the Internet comes from its continued openness in light all efforts of single entities to control it. If the FCC allows corporations to leverage their wealth in order to gain more direct access to consumers through the throttling of Internet speeds, there may be many negative ramifications for the open Internet. When success on the Internet is even partially based on the economic status of creators, the level playing field of opportunity on the Internet can cease to exist. America has prided itself on its citizen's ability to pursue "The American Dream" and have equal opportunity to achieve it. Yet if the FCC jeopardizes the open Internet, today's strongest framework for equal opportunity, through Internet speed throttling, that dream may be severely affected.

Our government is capable of supporting Net Neutrality, and because the alternative is detrimental to the ideas our country was founded on, it has an obligation to do so. Congress, please consider the consequences of Net Neutrality not just for ISPs and big internet corporations, but for all Internet citizens worldwide.

Sincerely,
Mckenna Cisler
