

AT&T want to disconnect the Bell South cabled network since there are no customers left for the service.

When they took over the network they claimed it would be beneficial to consumers and promised broadband for all Bell customers by 2007.

There must have never been the intention to do anything with the network other than monopolizing the Bell South customers.

Please see pictures below, this is what almost a decade of AT&T brought to my community.

- * Wonder why consumers are leaving
- * Broken promises
- * Left rural communities without service
- * In a decade not even made it to DSL
- * Wireless "broadband" should not be qualified as such with just a few GB data limit.

Now want to take over Direct TV to offer convenient triple play service (real broadband, now that would be convenient) further squeezing the rural communities with their limited wireless and now still the ability to draw TV subscription fees from them as well.

AT&T took us rural customers for a ride and there seem to be no consequences for them, they can lie and promise whatever they want to get a deal through, just back track on it after the deal, without taking any responsibility for the common good of the USA.
