

Hello,

I am commenting to say that on the matter of preserving net neutrality, there is no question what decision you need to make. No. Question. The only answer you can legitimately give is that you will oppose the wishes of the cable companies lobbying for a two tier internet. Why? Because internet belongs to us all. Internet is the great levelling field, that cares not for ethnicity or gender or socio economic strength—internet is more the land of the free than the country that claims to be just that. If you don't do something, and if you don't do the right thing, all that will be gone. Forever. I don't think anyone, not anyone except those that would gain even more money than they already have off it, wants this to happen. A two tier internet would weigh that last even ish place left to humanity in the favor of those who already win just about everything anyway: The people and corporations with money. If you ever mean to actually support what it is your job to support, the answer is clear. If you ever want a decent chance for anyone to do things, the answer is clear. If you, like every other human being in this country, use the internet on a daily basis, appreciate small businesses, wish the world were fair, do research, or care in the least about your own goddamned communication with the rest of the world—there is only one answer. You know what that is. You had better f*cking know what that is. Because if you let cable companies break the internet, we're all going to be screwed.

Make the right choice. Make the only choice.
