

60001030987.txt

The FCC should not have full authority over the internet. To begin, the Federal Communication Commission is overburdened and underfunded as it stands. Secondly, this is the same organization that has control over the television and phone providers, industries currently dominated in this country by monopolies. The FCC has a poor track record when it comes to keeping the playing field balanced. Further, the wording in the bill to be voted on is extremely vague and offers few restrictions on the FCC's power. Something vital to the core value of the internet is absolute freedom of expression. I feel that if this bill is ratified under a constitutional amendment, it's going to cause a whole lot of problems down the road. It will be nearly impossible to tweak to suit the needs of the public.