

60001077106.txt

Wireline landline are both one in the same changing name is still the landline that runs from the pole to every household in America. It has been that way for 50yrs so I cannot accept that because of the new technologies that it was assumed that our landlines were no longer necessary, that is in the sense, that we have used our telecommunications as a way to stay connected. However, it appears that that has not been the case. Under current ruling and confusion our domestic telecommunications has been denied /in favor of competition and innovation, which has left millions of Americans without dependable reliable telecommunications to our homes as it was intended under the "Telecommunications Act", 1938-1991 both of these are one in the same. Nothing in the original Act change, they just amended the act to include not to take away. Or change the existing way of telecommunications in favor of less reliable less dependable forms of communication.