

60001120370.txt

There are a lot of things wrong with our country and it's relationship with big business but the issue of stopping net neutrality in particular, I feel is incredibly un-american. Let's start with my personal experiences, I've lived in Arizona for 8 years and in that time I've owned two houses and stayed in three separate apartments. In all five locations I have purchased internet service and in all five places I only had one option, Cox. I'm certainly not the only one either, the net providers are very open about their lack of competition, and if that isn't a monopoly I don't know what is. I also paid over a hundred extra dollars a month for the fastest internet service and found out two years later after wasting thousands of dollars that I was only receiving less than 25 percent of the speed I was paying for. In conclusion, the monopoly the net providers have is un-American and the fact that they stand to gain so much from killing net neutrality against overwhelming opposition including Amazon Google and others is doubly wrong. We're supposed to be a democracy, if the majority doesn't want something Even the very very few and powerful do, it should not happen. Period.