

60001323984.txt

I am ardently opposed to the FCC facilitating/enabling Internet service providers from providing "fast lanes" and "slow lanes" in order to extort additional money from content providers - who in turn will pass the additional costs associated with any such move on to consumers. The Internet needs to be a level playing field and it is incumbent upon the FCC to maintain Net Neutrality. Pandering to Internet service providers and their lobbyists with big checkbooks will further decrease competition and hinder start-ups in streaming video services, increase costs to end users, and allow for even worse customer service from internet service providers - if that is even possible. I implore the FCC to maintain Net Neutrality.