Dear FCC,

My name is Daemon and I live in Denver, CO.

The principles of user choice and control are vitally important for a vibrant wireless ecosystem. But as written, the NPRM threatens to undermine these ideals by limiting what users can do with their devices. That's a concern, because I don't want to see community innovations, such as mesh networking, get cut off.

The draft rules could enable device manufacturers to forbid third-party software, which would make me feel less safe about the wireless networks I use and operate.

As a citizen of the United States of America and resident on this planet I believe that open wireless devices are a part of our freedoms under the constitution and just as humans. Open wireless promotes creative thinking and innovative ideas as well as let us share those ideas with the entire world. Should Open Wireless Devices be restricted, the entire world will lose an important part of modern culture that is currently paving the path into the future. Cable companies and wireless issuers already make plenty of money off monthly charges for internet access and then there is also the revenue generated from advertisements on every website. Stop trying to make a monopoly of what the world owns and uses just for profit, we as a planet built what the internet is today and we deserve to use it.

Sincerely,

Daemon
